June 28th presents:

E-Mentoring with Aboriginal Youth

Supporting Effective Community-University Partnerships

This webinar will highlight two community-university partnerships where local community members are provided with increased access to information, resources, and relationships that would be difficult to establish otherwise.

eMentoring BC connects Aboriginal youth in Grades 6-12 with post-secondary health science students they'd be otherwise unable to meet. Mentors and mentees communicate online and go through a Personal Quest that includes questions, activities, and topics that are meant to encourage youth to consider a career in the health sciences and the pathways to get there. Since 2011, 189 mentees in school or community settings have connected with 120 mentors across BC.

The Ktunaxa Community Learning Centres (CLCs) provided rural community members with local access to information and resources based on community-defined priorities. CLCs provided health information and resources on a number of health issues, including diabetes, cancer, addictions, suicide – anything that community members wanted to learn about. Workshops on a variety of topics were also held; including music recording workshops targeted towards youth, resume building workshops, etc. CLCs were also a space for local Elders to translate health content into their traditional language for the wider community to learn.
